RESPONSE TO MARLON JAMES @ BABEL, FALL '16

By LaCherie Reid

It was such a pleasure being able to hear Marlon James speak at Kleinhans Music Hall. I have never been able to hear the thought process of a published author. James talks about where his inspiration comes from as an author, where he gets his ideas, and how he uses what he has been through as motivation to keep prevailing. He says, “books come from books”. At first I thought that this was a very general statement, hoping that he would elaborate. What he meant was, as artists, we often get so consumed by our ideas that they remain ideas and never actually get published or created. James went in depth on how it is so important not to do this. Because as an artist it is important that you share your work with the world so people could somehow benefit from it and use it as inspiration for themselves. That is our duty as artists. No matter how big or small the idea, create it. Because, when you create one thing, it becomes easier and more comfortable to create the next thing. Before you know it, ideas start pouring from ideas that start pouring from other ideas.
